Blaze forces relocation of five residents

MONIQUE VALDES
Opinions Editor

A fire caused by a lightning strike damaged the ceiling of a building at Pegasus Pointe on Sunday afternoon, forcing five residents to relocate, according to an incident report released by Orange County Fire Rescue. There were no injuries, and all residents were evacuated from the building, according to UCF News & Information.

At the time of the fire, there was a heavy storm with lightning in the area.

Orange County Fire Rescue responded to the call at 3:15 p.m. There had been calls about alarms going off in Buildings 2 and 3. Firefighters, EMTs and paramedics arrived on the scene.

On initial investigation, fire rescue found nothing in the two buildings.

When maintenance was called to reset the systems, a building security guard approached a firefighter and pointed to "brown turbulent smoke issuing from the ridge vent of Building 1," according to the incident report.

Every day, college students are at risk of being slipped a date rape drug.

It can happen when you go out for drinks or accept food from someone you don't know. It can happen when you accept food or drinks from someone you do know.

Anyone is at risk.

According to the Drug Enforcement Administration's website, date rape drugs are those used to aid in sexual assault and are most commonly found in bars, nightclubs, raves and gyms.

The drugs include GHB, GBL and benzodiazepines such as rohypnol (roofies). Alcohol, by itself, can be used to aide sexual assault.

The DEA's website describes date rape drugs as undetectable. They have no odor or taste. Once ingested, they quickly exit the body. Most people do not know they have been drugged because of memory loss, which can last up to 12 hours.

Unfortunately, knowing what to do when you or someone you know believes their food or drink has been spiked isn't common knowledge. However, students have many places that they can turn to for help.

A look back at the legacy of Michael Jackson

GREGORY CLAY

McClatchy-Tribune News Service

They were the conspicuous signs of the times. Suddenly, hats, posters and T-shirts seemingly popped up everywhere. There were "King of Pop" baseball caps.

There were T-shirts featuring the likeness of Michael Jackson and Nelson Mandela; Michael Jackson and Malcolm X; Michael Jackson and President Barack Obama; MJ vs. MJ, that is Michael Jordan dribbling a basketball facing Michael Jackson dancing on his tippy-toes.

The memorabilia was a reflection of Michael Jackson's shocking death on June 25, 2009. Has it been that long already? Yes, it surely seems like yesterday.

The outpouring of emotion from fans around the world captured the moment. The international sense of loss was palpable. The collective mourning — which was part hysteria and part disbelief — was unlike anything we've seen since the unexpected deaths of Elvis Presley and Princess Diana.

"There are a lot of people who have been attached to Michael Jackson," says Dr. Alvin Poussaint, professor of psychiatry at Harvard Medical School, during a telephone interview from Boston. "They feel they have lost access to Michael's creativity."

If the world's population is an estimated 6.8 billion, it seemed 6.5 billion of them offered a visceral reaction to Michael's death.

Academy Award-winning director Martin Scorsese was quoted as saying of Jackson: "Michael Jackson was extraordinary. When we worked together on 'Bad' (music video), I was in awe of his absolute mastery of movement on the one hand, and of the music on the other. Every step he took was absolutely precise and fluid at the same time."

"It was like watching quicksilver in motion. He was wonderful to work with, an absolute professional at all times, and — it really goes without saying — a true artist. It will be a while before I can get used to the idea that he's no longer with us."

The general public adamantly displayed an insatiable appetite for the ATM: All Things Mike.

As CNN president Jonathan Klein said during a Michael Jackson panel discussion in 2009 at the annual National Association of Black Journalists Convention in Tampa: "There was such an enormous interest in this story. We were overwhelmed, globally. And we are a global network."

And the incessant media coverage showed: For three weeks straight, CNN's Larry King Live, for instance, featured at least one segment on Jackson after his death.

Furthermore, according to Howard Kurtz, Washington Post media critic and host of CNN's Reliable Sources, on the day of Jackson's death, CNN's ratings skyrocketed 937 percent at one point, MSNBC's 330 percent and Fox's 243 percent.

And newspapers such as the New York Post and New York Daily News produced special sections, replete with double-page-sized pullout posters of Jackson.

Says Richard Prince, Internet media columnist for the Maynard Institute for Journalism Education: "In this media environment, when there are websites and media outlets for everyone's particular interest, I don't think you can say there was too much media coverage of Michael Jackson."

"But I didn't see enough analysis about why the choices Michael Jackson made in his life led to his demise, and what that should tell the rest of us about the society that we have created. If this is what you have to do to become a megastar, is it worth it? He felt that he had to wear wigs and have plastic surgery to conform to what he believed was people's expectations of what a superstar should look like. Then suddenly, he didn't look like a black person anymore."

Remember, in the early minutes following the news of Jackson's death, AT&T reported that 65,000 text messages were transmitted per second (normal traffic was 40,000). Klein said CNN's Internet traffic increased fivefold from the time of Jackson's death to the memorial service held at Los Angeles' Staples Center on July 7, 2009.

The attendees paid tribute to Michael for his innovation, and, yes he was a pioneer, too.

Bryan Monroe, former vice president and editorial director for Ebony magazine, is widely credited with conducting the last one-on-one, domestic interview with Jackson, which appeared in the publication December 2007.

When speaking of shattering a glass ceiling at MTV, Jackson told Ebony: "They came right out and said it — they wouldn't play my music. It broke my heart. I refuse to be ignored. So I came up with 'Thriller' and I was always trying to outdo myself... But when they played 'Billie Jean,' it set the all-time record. Then they were asking me for everything we had."

"They were knocking our door down. Then Prince came; it opened the door for Prince and all the other black artists..." The week of Jackson's death seemed surreal. That Tuesday (June 23), Ed McMahon, Johnny Carson's longtime sidekick on The Tonight Show, died at 86 of multiple health problems; then, early afternoon on that Thursday (June 25), actress Farrah Fawcett died of cancer at 62; later that afternoon, we were shocked by the news flash of Jackson's death at 50.

Says Poussaint, who has appeared on such television shows as Nightline: "Michael Jackson had a lot of signs of a troubled life — his anxiety, his vitiligo (skin-whitening condition). People could see he was a delicate human being."

Delicate, but still profitable after death.

According to Forbes.com, Jackson was the third-highest earning dead celebrity in 2009. In the four months after his death, Jackson's estate earned approximately $90 million, behind only fashion designer Yves St. Laurent ($350 million) and musical composers Richard Rodgers and Oscar Hammerstein ($235 million). Behind Jackson was Elvis Presley, at $55 million.

Could Jackson's death, just as Elvis', also become sort of a mystery theater? Famous celebrity plus mysterious death often equals a ripe cocktail for conspiracy theorists.

Residents allowed home as Ariz. fire persists

MICHELE PRICE
Associated Press

FLAGSTAFF, Ariz. — An estimated 1,000 people who were forced to flee their homes because of a forest fire outside Flagstaff were being allowed to return Wednesday morning.

Homeowners and their families began to trickle into the evacuated neighborhoods at 8 a.m. They had left their homes Sunday after the fire erupted just north of the northern Arizona city that is home to 60,000 people.

"We're very glad," said resident Lula Whitehair, 49. "When we saw that fire coming, we thought the worst."

Crews had enough confidence in their fire lines to give the local sheriff the OK to lift the evacuation order, but he warned residents to be prepared to leave again if necessary.

The battle against the 22-square-mile Schultz fire was far from over. At least 10 miles of fire line still needed to be completed, and the blaze was just 20 percent contained. Crews

Wednesday planned to secure and widen the line on the southern flank of the fire to keep it from surging back toward the city. Meanwhile, firefighters aided by air tankers and helicopters were trying to stop its growth to the north.

Efforts to fight the blaze will likely continue for at least two weeks, incident commander Dugger Hughes said late Tuesday.

"It's going to be a long haul," he said. "But it's looking good."

The fire's southern edge is about five miles from Flagstaff.

Two heavy air tankers helped fight the blaze

Tuesday, said fire spokesman Eric Neitzel. The tankers, part of 19 under contract through the U.S. Forest Service to fight fires across the country, are capable of carrying more than 2,000 gallons of fire retardant used to slow the spread of fire. Nearly 1,000 firefighters were battling the blaze.

Authorities said the fire was started by an abandoned campfire, and strong winds quickly fanned the flames. No major injuries have been reported and no structures have burned.

The blaze tore through stands of ponderosa pine that ring the city and rise up the slopes of nearby mountains. Conditions are dry, despite record amounts of snowfall in the area last winter.

Authorities said a campfire also was to blame for a smaller fire in southeast Flagstaff. Campfires will be prohibited in three Arizona forests starting Wednesday.

The southeast Flagstaff fire was 80 percent contained Tuesday afternoon, and a third fire 11 miles northeast of Williams was expected to be fully contained Wednesday.

Arizona Gov. Jan Brewer toured the fire area Tuesday. Earlier in the day, she spoke with President Barack Obama, who assured her of the federal government's continued support in firefighting efforts. Two requests from the state for federal fire management assistance funds have been granted.

passed through the breezeways on all three floors of Building 1 in an attempt to further evacuate the building.

When he pulled the alarm on the first floor of the building, it didn't sound.

The reason for the alarm's failure has yet to be determined.

The incident report stated that Moody made his way to the third floor, where two firefighters had already begun to pull ceiling in the breezeway to get to the source of the fire. The fire was then knocked down and confined to the attic. It took three firefighters to contain and then put out the fire.

Part of the building was blocked off temporarily after the fire but is now accessible.

FLA-CAT, a full-service insurance restoration contractor, has been on the scene since.

Pegasus Pointe is a UCF-affiliated student housing complex located on Alafaya Trail.

According to Chad Binette, the associate director of UCF News & Information, UCF Housing and Residence Life staff were able to assist the five students not able to return to their apartments.

According to the incident report, several of the apartments also suffered water damage.

This isn't the first time a fire has occurred at Pegasus Pointe.

In November 2004, an unattended cigarette caused a fire at Building 11. The building had to be rebuilt.

Coincidentally the fire on Sunday happened the first day of Lightning Safety Awareness Week.

Advocates help victims review their options

FROM A1

Prevention and Intervention Services, the on-campus Health Center and the UCF Police Department.

Victim Services offers advocacy services to assist members of the UCF community who have been victimized.

Advocates are available to assist students if they wish to seek counseling, medical attention or file a police report. It is an advocate's job to guide them through the process of their choosing.

"We are a 24-hour program, so someone can access an advocate 24 hours a day," said Christine Mouton, coordinator advocate for UCF Victim Services. "Initially, it's a phone call. They can explain to the advocate what the situation is, and then based on the situation, the advocate can give them options."

Victims can choose to access forensic exams, file a police report and make emergency appointments at the women's clinic or counseling center.

Letters to professors for students whose class schedule may have been affected are also provided. The letters do not disclose any information.

Even if you are not the person who has been victimized, it is always best to help someone seek help for himself or herself.

"You can't make somebody come, but you can just be that person that says there are resources on campus that will help you and that they are confidential," Mouton said.

Victim Services is located off campus on Research Parkway.

"We're in the same building as the medical school, so it's confidential. No one would know that person was coming into our office," Mouton said.

The UCF Counseling Center, next to the Health Center, is one of several outlets for students who have been victimized.

Victim Services also has an e-mail service called "Ask an Advocate."

"If anyone has a question or concern they can always e-mail 'Ask an Advocate,' and they will get a response," Mouton said. "They will get some direction, some options, referrals. They can schedule for an appointment to come in and meet with an advocate, or they can just talk to an advocate over the phone."

There is not a set-in-stone reaction to being a victim. Mouton said every victim is different and should do what is comfortable for him or her.

"It's really different for everybody, because everybody is unique, and everybody has already had different life experiences once they get to that point," she said. "If they want to know what their options are, they aren't sure what to do or they just feel traumatized and unsure of what's available, then obviously the best thing is to call the advocate."

Mouton said that help can be offered at any time, even days after a crime occurred.

If the victim wishes to report to the police, the sooner they seek help, the better. Forensic evidence can be collected up to 72 hours after a crime.

The UCF Police Department can take a report, find out if the victim wishes to press charges, or do an investigation if the suspect is unknown and the victim wants to prosecute.

According to Officer Jeannette Emert of the UCF police, the best course of action if one believes he or she has been given a date rape drug is to seek medical attention.

"First, as soon as a person thinks something has been given to them, they should go to an emergency room with someone else driving," Emert said. "A friend, parent or even an ambulance will do. Next, as the victim, decide what you want to do about it."

Emert also said that a victim should have some form of identification and an idea of what happened.

It is helpful for victims to know when their food or drink was left unattended.

If someone is not the victim but knows someone who is, it is best to stay by the person and be prepared to offer as much information as possible to the police.

"It depends on if it's a person known or if this is a stranger kind of thing," Emert said. "If it's a friend, I would hope they'd stay close and go to the hospital with the possible victim. But at the very least, be aware of their health."

In order to be safe and have fun when drinking, Emert advised students to stay with friends. Students should also be aware of their surroundings.

According to the UCF Police Department's website, students should never leave their drinks unattended. If a bartender is preparing someone's drink, it is best to watch the drink being made.

Students should always go out with friends and have a designated driver. If something happens, they should seek medical attention right away.

"Have a plan of action of what to do so you don't panic if it happens to you or your friend," Emert said.

Being slipped a date rape drug is a situation that is completely avoidable. UCF Prevention and Intervention Services offer programs so students can learn how to make healthy decisions when it comes to drugs and alcohol.

"The REAL Project" offers a program called Concealed Weapons.

"During this program, students have the opportunity to learn about the possibility of drug-induced sexual assault and how to avoid becoming a victim of non-consensual drug use and/or sexual assault," said Stephanie Spies, program coordinator of Prevention and Intervention Services.

The program also addresses consent to sex and how to make safer decisions when it comes to alcohol and its impact on decision-making and sex.

According to Spies, alcohol is the No. 1 date rape drug. This is because alcohol is easy to access, legal if you are older than 21 and people do not think of it as a date rape drug.

Spies said that date rape drugs such as GHB and rohypnol are less common than they used to be, but students still need to take steps to prevent themselves from being slipped something.

Iris Y. Cruz, assistant director of UCF Prevention and Intervention Services, urged those who believe they have been given a date rape drug to contact Victim Services.

"Understandably, a student in such a situation may feel scared or alone, and our clinicians help students become connected to resources available to them," Cruz said. "In doing so, our goal is to empower students to get the support that they may need to effectively cope with such a difficult event in their life. Additionally, we provide students with information that can help them change their alcohol use in order to decrease the likelihood of another such event from occurring in the future."

rent space in the registrar's office until the end of December before moving all operations to the new space.

Veteran Services will still be maintained under the registrar's umbrella and offer select services of the that office, such as change-of-major forms.

"The new office will be good for work," said Seth Grubb, a junior micro and molecular biology major, Veteran Services Office employee and army veteran. "We won't have to piggy-back off the registrar's office. We'll have our own area. I think we needed that. We don't really have a place of our own on campus."

Veteran Services signed the lease with the Arena for the next four years with an option for a fifth, choosing the space in the Arena because it "was one of the places on campus that had the space," according to Mark Allen Poisel, associate vice president of Student Development and Enrollment Services.

Construction on the existing space will cost between $300,000 and $400,000, with $300,000 coming out of the provost's budget, and the remaining difference being covered by the student development and enrollment board, according to Poisel.

This total accounts for all build-out costs for the offices and study rooms, including fixtures, furniture, design and construction.

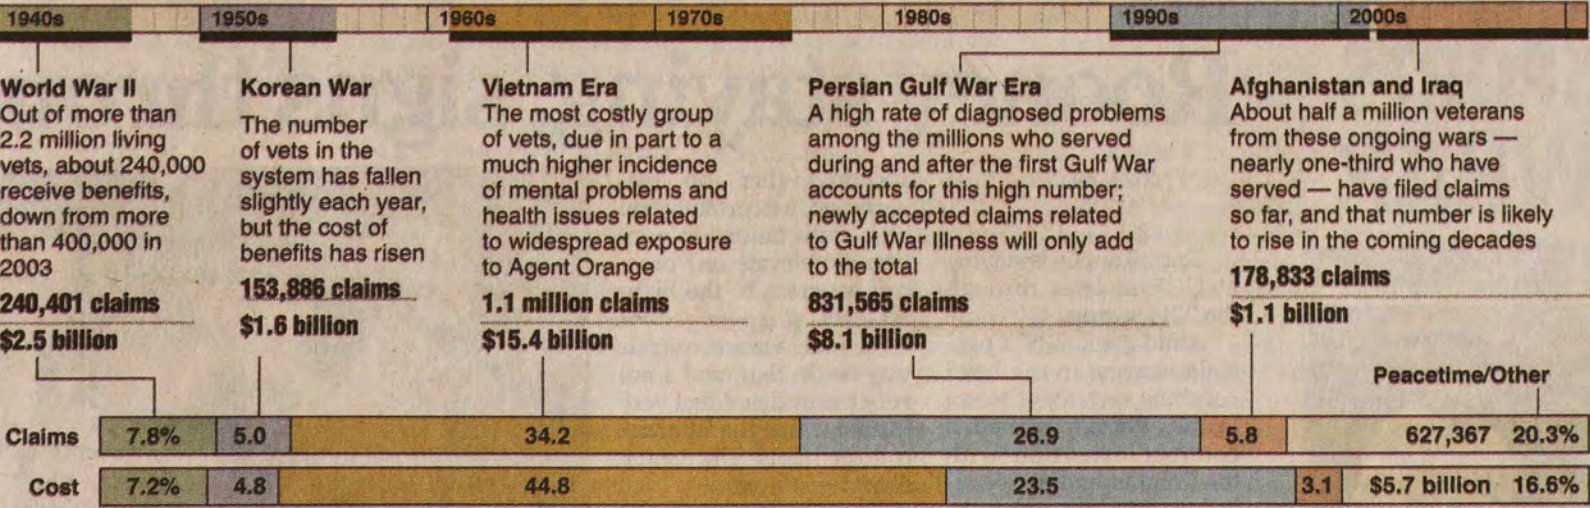

The connecting study spaces are available to all students, not just veterans, and will be open until 11 p.m., even though the Veteran Services Office will close at 5 p.m. or 5:30 p.m., depending on the day of the week.

Tutoring will be offered in these study rooms through the Student Academic Resource Center's office. The rooms will also be available for reservations, much like the study rooms in the library.

"We hear students complain about not having a study space near the Towers," Middlekauff said. "There are only so many spots in the library."

Middlekauff says he hopes the new office and study spaces will not only help veterans but also SARC and the businesses in and around the arena.

This new office should further ensure UCF's continued presence among the top 15 percent of G.I. Jobs magazine's national list of the most "military friendly schools" whose recruiting programs and veterans services are the most embracing of veteran turned students.

In November, Veteran Services will move to its new location, left, in the Arena for at least four years.

MARLINS FIRE GONZALEZ AS MANAGER, LOOK TO OTHERS

BALTIMORE — Fredi Gonzalez was fired as manager of the Florida Marlins on Wednesday, with the team owner saying "we can do better and be better."

The Marlins are 34-36 following a win over Baltimore on Tuesday night. Florida began the day in fourth place in the NL East, 7 1/2 games behind first-place Atlanta.

Edwin Rodriguez, who has spent the past 17 seasons as manager of Triple-A New Orleans, takes over as manager on an interim basis.

Also fired were bench coach Carlos Tosca and hitting coach Jim Presley. They were replaced on an interim basis by Brandon Hyde and John Mallee.

"We owe it to our fans to put this team in the best possible position to win," owner Jeffrey Loria said in a statement. "Everyone knows how I feel about winning. That's the reason we're making this change."

Gonzalez did not immediately return a phone call or a text message seeking comment.

In three-plus seasons as the Marlins' manager, Gonzalez was 276-279. Before the 2009 season, he received a contract extension through 2011.

Gonzalez is the third manager to lose his job this season. The others are Dave Trembley at Baltimore and Trey Hillman at Kansas City.

When last season ended, Gonzalez's job was considered in jeopardy because Loria was upset that the Marlins failed to make the playoffs, although they finished 12 games above .500 with the smallest payroll in baseball. Several times this year Loria denied Gonzalez should be worried about his job security, most recently at the start of a trip May 7 in Washington.

But at the start of spring training, Loria had made it clear he had high hopes this season.

"I expect us to make the playoffs," he said. "We've got all the ammunition we need."

That comment ratcheted up expectations for a team that outscored opponents by six runs last season and made no major offseason additions. Payroll this season is about $45 million, the highest since 2005 but still third-lowest in the NL.

RAYS OWNER TO EXPLORE NEW SITES FOR BALLPARK

ST. PETERSBURG — Rays owner Stuart Sternberg wants to explore potential sites for a new ballpark throughout the Tampa Bay area, reiterating his belief that downtown St. Petersburg is not a viable location for a replacement for Tropicana Field.

Although he did not rule out the prospect of remaining in Pinellas County, the owner called Monday for regional talks that would include discussions about alternative in neighboring Tampa and Hillsborough County.

"I know the facts are too persuasive to ignore. Baseball will not work long term in downtown St. Petersburg," said Sternberg, who read a seven-minute statement but did not take questions during a new conference. "And I know that the Rays want to remain in Tampa Bay."

The club's lease at Tropicana Field runs through 2027. Sternberg has said repeatedly that the Rays will not be playing in the domed stadium on the edge of downtown when that agreement expires.

Despite owning the best record in baseball for most of this season, the Rays rank 23rd in the major leagues in home attendance, drawing an average of 22,301 per game.

Rooney staying, signs through 2014

RYAN BASS
Sports Editor

Terry Rooney is staying at UCF, at least through the 2014 season.

Amid rumors of a possible interest in the head coaching vacancy at Notre Dame, Rooney signed a contract extension with the Knights, ending speculation that the two-year head coach could bolt for the Fighting Irish.

"I am really excited about continuing on as head baseball coach here at UCF," Rooney said in a phone interview. "I feel we have accomplished quite a bit the first two years here with our coaching staff, and I think the future is extremely bright. When I accepted this job two years ago, we certainly had high expectations to continue to elevate our baseball program to the highest level.

"I feel we are on our way to do that, and I am very pleased and feel very fortunate that the administration feels the same way."

Rooney, who won 33 games in 2010 and led the Knights to 10 wins in Conference USA play, the most since the Knights joined C-USA in 2005, was a rumored candidate for the Notre Dame position but said this contract shows how committed he is to staying in Orlando.

"The only thing I'm going to say in reference to Terry Rooney led UCF to 33 wins in 2010, the most for the program since winning 42 games in 2005 before joining C-USA.

Kentucky PG John Wall is the consensus No. 1 pick to the Washington Wizards on most draft boards entering tonight's 2010 NBA Draft. As for the Magic and Heat, they'll have options to improve their teams.

2010 NBA Draft could breathe new hope into Orlando Magic franchise

There are a lot of reasons to be disappointed if you are an Orlando Magic fan.

Coming of its second consecutive 59-win season, the team was unceremoniously ousted from the playoffs by the Boston Celtics, which essentially fielded the same squad as it did last season, when the Magic beat Boston in seven games to advance to the Eastern Conference Finals.

But the Magic were indeed exposed this time around. The team floundered against its first taste of quality competition, leaving us with a more than a few questions as to the legitimacy of their roster's composition.

Thursday brings the NBA Draft, a day that, ideally, can breathe new hope into a franchise.

Here's a look at what the Magic have going for them heading into the draft.

What the team has

Here's what we know: Orlando has the best center in the league in Dwight Howard.

That remains the one staunch truth of the team, regardless of whether his teammates are making their shots or if the defense is showing up.

Howard is what the team will be built around for the foreseeable future, and that, of course, will influence what the

A good draft important in Heat's chances of re-signing D-Wade

Four years removed from an NBA title and the dynamic duo of Dwyane Wade and Shaquille O'Neal, it's safe to say the Miami Heat need to rebuild.

So as Thursday's 2010 NBA Draft will bleed optimism into a Heat franchise, it's important to note that these moves could impact the Heat's chances of resigning their heart and soul, Wade.

Let's be honest, Wade's been a one-man wrecking crew for the Heat the past two seasons (no, I don't consider Jermaine O'Neal or Mario Chalmers a valid sidekick), and they have been a playoff team in the Eastern Conference.

Oh, and they still made the playoffs in those seasons, and Wade almost led them to the next round.

But this team needs help, and that comes in the form of four picks in the draft that could hold one of the pieces to Wade re-signing with Miami.

What the team has

Mario Chalmers, Michael Beasley and Daequan Cook.

That's all that's left on the Heat's roster, as 10 players become unrestricted free agents July 1, and that's not saying much.

the upper echelon in the country, and we are on our way to doing that."

Under Rooney, the Knights improved their win total by 11 games in 2010.

He brought in the No. 4-ranked recruiting class prior to the season, and the program saw arguably its best offensive season ever under the head coach.

"I am very pleased with the progress of our baseball program under coach Rooney," UCF Director of Athletics Keith Tribble said in a release. "We've continually improved during his first two seasons at UCF, both academically and athletically. With his exceptional recruiting, we've established ourselves as a program that can now compete for our conference championship in upcoming seasons."

As for Rooney, he says it's important to have management in place that believes in the vision he has for the program.

"We talk about it all the time, you are only as good and successful as the people that you are around,"

Rooney said. "I just feel so fortunate to have the administration here that we do in Keith Tribble and [Senior Associate Athletic Director for Internal Operations] David Hansen, two people that are tremendous supporters of our program. It's great to know that people here in the university, the community and nationally see the direction this baseball program is going."

Despite being on the road recruiting, Rooney has been trying to make time to watch some of the matchups in the College World Series.

It's a place he's familiar with and hopes he can lead his team there under the span of his new contract.

"Anytime I get a chance to watch the World Series I certainly do," Rooney said. "It's a place that I've been and certainly a place I hope to bring our baseball program to. Like I said, I want our kids to embrace that and I want people to embrace that here in our baseball program. To have a chance to see those outstanding teams compete I hope gives our players motivation."

Miller named to Nagurski list

RYAN BASS
Sports Editor

Bruce Miller is arguably the best player on UCF's defense.

Now, he's been recognized as one of the best defensive players in the nation.

Miller was named to the national Watch List for the Bronko Nagurski Trophy, which is given annually to the nation's top defensive player.

The Knights' defensive end enters the 2010 season as the nation's career leader in sacks (27) and career tackles for loss (44). He has already been named to several preseason All-American teams.

In 2009, Miller had one of the best years for a defensive player in program history. He recorded 13 sacks and 18 tackles for loss on his way to winning the 2009 Conference USA Defensive Player of the Year Award.

Miller isn't just in the top of the nation with his career sacks, but he's near the best in the state of Florida as well. His 27 career sacks tie UF's Alonzo Johnson for the ninth-most ever by an FBS player in the state.

Miller helped the Knights to the No. 4-ranked defense in the nation in 2009.

He is responsible for arguably the play that turned the Knights season around, forcing a fumble against Marshall quarterback Brian Anderson in the fourth quarter of a home game on Nov. 1 that helped the Knights grab the come-from-behind victory.

Yahoo! ranks UCF tops in East
Coming off an 8-5 season and a trip to their third bowl game in school history — a 45-24 loss to Rutgers — the Knights received some recognition for their upcoming squad.

In its college football preview magazine released Tuesday, Yahoo! Sports ranked UCF as the best team in Conference USA's East Division — second in the conference behind Houston — and 51st best in the country.

The magazine, released annually, also selected as the Nov. 5 contest between the Knights and the Cougars as the game of the year for C-USA.

That late-season matchup will pit UCF against the team it upset last season for the Knights' first victory against a ranked team, and the game will be televised on ESPN2.

Cashman adds two recruits

UCF tennis head coach Brian Cashman added two more talented players to an already impressive recruiting class.

Francesc Aulina of Spain and Leonel Vivas of Venezuela will join the Knights' roster in the fall.

Aulina was recently ranked in the top 150 in the Spanish men's open national rankings, and Vivas was ranked as high as No. 2 in Venezuela in the boys 16s and the boys 18s junior rankings when he was in the country.

UCF's recruiting class, which includes such names as Matthew Zachary and Matthew Gladstone, was recently listed as the No. 26 class in the country by tennis-recruiting.net.

Bruce Miller, who was named to the Bronko Nagurski Trophy watch list, helped lead UCF to a No. 4-ranked defense in 2009 with his 13 sacks and 18 tackles for loss.

Magic need shot creators

FROM A8

Magic do in the draft.

For better or worse, Orlando is also saddled with Rashard Lewis, Vince Carter and Jameer Nelson, a workable supporting cast, to be sure, but one that could use an upgrade.

Biggest need

The biggest need for Orlando is someone who can create his own shot.

Nelson should spend a lot of quality time during the offseason to shore up his passing, but when you look at the roster, there is not a sure-fire playmaker to be found.

Sure, J.J. Redick is nice to have running around the court and coming off screens, and Carter can perform serviceably once every 15 games or so.

But Redick is a shooter with good cardio and Carter is, well, I guess he is a basketball player, but neither of them are the ones who will be able to help when the perimeter shots aren't falling and double teams are swarming Howard.

Potential picks

Picking so late in the draft — the 29th and 59th picks in the draft, with seemingly no inclination to trade them — the options for improvement are limited.

Ideally, Oklahoma State's James Anderson would fall into their laps, but that won't happen.

But Jordan Crawford, from Xavier, could be available, and if so, the Magic should snap him up.

Scouts and analysts say one of Crawford's weaknesses is that he is only effective with the ball in his hands, which, fortunately, is exactly what Orlando Magic's Dwight Howard reacts during the second half of Game 5 against the Boston Celtics during the NBA Eastern Conference basketball finals.

Orlando needs.

Another possibility is a somewhat local pick that those in black and gold may not be too thrilled about: Dominique Jones from USF.

Jones can't shoot like Crawford, nor can he get to the basket and finish like Crawford, but he is much better without the ball and would be a fine Nate Robinson-esque player off the bench.

Even if Georgia Tech power forward Gani Lawal or Florida State's Solomon Alabi were available, Orlando has absolutely no need for another post player with its first-round pick.

With Howard, Marcin Gortat — for now — Brandon Bass and Ryan Anderson all under contract for 2010-11, it would be a waste to pick another player of that ilk to a guaranteed deal.

And if there were any truth to the floated rumors of sending Carter and Nelson to New Orleans for Chris Paul, the need for a scoring two-guard becomes paramount.

Given Orlando's drafting prowess — or, rather, the lack thereof — the past few seasons, it's no guarantee the Magic will come away with the player they want, or a player who actually stays with the team.

But Magic fans should feel good about the team's future whatever draft day brings, because they are still built to win a lot of games.

And there are worse things in the world than being a fan of one of the top four teams in the league: You could be a fan of the Miami Heat.

Heat need help everywhere

FROM A6

The Heat just exercised their option on Chalmers, keeping him as the point guard at least for one more season.

Beasley has been anything but consistent since Miami selected him with the No. 2 pick two years ago.

Actually, he's been more productive off the court and has caused headaches on the court as a player that has underproduced and hasn't grown into the player Pat Riley thought he would be when they selected him.

As for Cook, he's another guy that has been a double-edged sword for the Heat, playing solid minutes one night and underperforming another.

But with Cook, you know you're going to get solid production off the bench and a quality 3-point shooter.

Biggest need

It's no secret that ever since the Heat sent Shaquille O'Neal to Phoenix in 2008 that they have been missing that inside presence.

They brought in another

O'Neal, Jermaine, but he's been injured, and he's not the same player from years past.

Miami desperately needs an inside presence to take all the pressure away from Wade and give him a target down low.

But center isn't the only area the Heat could use help in. Outside of Wade, assuming he re-signs, the Heat have needs at every single position.

Beasley isn't the answer, Udonis Haslem is expected to leave and take more money elsewhere and Chalmers could use some grooming, so look for Miami to be all over the place in an attempt to fill needs.

Potential picks

With one first-round pick and three selections in the second round, the Heat could wind up anywhere with the kind of players they could bring in.

At pick No. 18, I think Miami goes with a promising player then the most pressing need.

Look for Kentucky guard Eric Bledsoe to be the pick here.

He was overshadowed by John Wall, who will be the No. 1 overall selection by the Washington Wizards, but don't underestimate him.

He's a quick and physical point guard who focuses on his defense, exactly the type of player Riley is looking to insert into the lineup.

Don't be surprised if Riley does look to immediate options and take Daniel Orton out of Kentucky or Solomon Alabi out of FSU, as both are NBA-ready at the center position.

The second round becomes a crapshoot, but Miami does feature back-to-back picks at 41 and 42.

Expect a center and power forward to come off the board here, probably Jerome Jordan out of Tulsa and forward Tiny Gallon out of Oklahoma. With their final pick at 48, I expect the Heat to find a steal like they did with Chalmers a few years ago and grab a guy like Greivis Vasquez, the talented guard out of Maryland.

Just remember, as you're watching the Heat's draft keep Wade in mind.

You know Riley will be doing the same.

Miami Heat's Dwyane Wade, left, and son Zaire sit courtside during the third quarter in Game 5 of the NBA basketball finals between the Boston Celtics and the Los Angeles Lakers on Sunday, June 13, in Boston.

Cream of the venue crop

The Social and Firestone Live welcome genres of all kinds

ALEXANDER YOUNGBLOOD
Contributing Writer

Orlando has played host to both nationally renowned and locally praised musical acts.

Located throughout the city, the venues that host these artists have become local hangout spots for many UCF students. Two downtown venues provide live concerts for the UCF population's diverse taste in music in two very different settings.

Firestone Live

Firestone Live is Orlando's oldest and largest downtown venue. Formerly known as Club Firestone, the site was renovated two years ago and changed from a club format to a pure concert and private party venue. The name change reflects the new atmosphere Firestone Live wants patrons to feel.

"There's really no comparison to any other venues," said Tom Davis, the marketing manager for Firestone Live. "If you like great live music, being downtown, and being in an intimate venue, then Firestone Live is for you."

Firestone Live has a capacity of 1,530 but still manages to keep an intimate setting through its design.

The main concert hall features two full bars. For concert-goers, the stage is set up high, so no matter where you are in the venue, you will have a view of the band.

While the venue is large, it is a good idea to arrive early, as lines are known to form before the doors open.

"I grew up in Orlando and have been to all the venues countless times," said Travis Slavens, a junior majoring in digital media. "I prefer Firestone, because it is bigger than all the other venues."

"We are very multi-faceted as far as genres go," Davis said.

Firestone Live has attracted multiple big names from many genres.

Whether it be Lil Wayne and Coolio for the hip-hop lovers, Dinosaur Jr. for the rockers, Passion Pit for indie fans or bands like GWAR for those into heavy metal, Firestone is likely to bring someone you like to town.

This year, Firestone Live is hosting the Vans Warped Tour for Orlando in the Firestone Amphitheater directly behind the main building.

The traveling punk and alternative rock fest features a slew of bands and will be taking place all day July 25th.

Weekly concerts take place every Friday and Sunday although there are other concerts and events that take place other nights and in the day. There is also a Ladies Night every Thursday.

"Firestone Live has become a destination," Davis said, "not just a drive-by."

If you want more information on Firestone Live and upcoming concerts visit firestonelive.net.

Tickets are sold through Ticketmaster as well as at the Firestone Live ticket office, which charges no service fees, located directly behind the venue.

Grown Ups' gags long in the tooth

MATT REINSTELE

It feels like it's been a while since "good movie" and Adam Sandler have been said in the same sentence.

Sandler's latest film, Grown Ups, is another big Hollywood comedy to feature an all-star cast, but it feels that this lineup is really desperate for a hit.

Along with Sandler, the film stars Chris Rock, Kevin James, David Spade and Rob Schneider.

This cast feels more like a sports team assembling a collection of aging veterans for one last shot at a championship.

And just like many of those teams, this film falls short of greatness.

The story is about five childhood friends who reunite after 30 years at the funeral of their youth basketball coach during Fourth of July weekend.

Sandler plays a Hollywood agent who is married to a fashion designer, played by Salma Hayek.

Rock is a stay-at-home dad, James is a father to a 4-year-old that still breast feeds, Spade is the single guy who never grew up and Schneider is a sensitive vegan married to a woman 20 years older than him.

After the funeral, the plot goes on cruise control as the parents deal with their family problems and the opposing team that Sandler's crew defeated in a basketball championship that won't let the loss go.

I understand being upset over losing a championship game, but holding a grudge over a youth game that happened 30 years ago is petty, even by low-brow humor standards.

Maya Rudolph, left, and Chris Rock and part of Grown Ups' ensemble cast that delivers nothing but tepid jokes.

As for the jokes, they are uninspiring.

A majority of the jokes come from each of the stars ripping on each other in a manner any group of friends would.

This works because you can tell that the cast have been friends for a long time — four of the five were on Saturday Night Live and have been in several movies together.

Any non-razzing jokes fall flat, because most of them were either shown in the trailers or were extremely predictable.

There are funny moments but no punch lines, set-piece jokes or catchphrases to think of.

I chuckled a couple of times, but nothing made me laugh.

The shining star in the laughter department comes from Steve Busce-mi's cameo.

Buscemi's "charming" good looks and injury gags were the most consistently funny parts of the film.

It is a shame that the stars of this movie are starting to look like they have lost a step, especially Sandler.

2009's Funny People, which hyped an all-star comedy cast, was a massive disappointment, and Grown Ups falls short of

MARGINALLY INTERESTED

Advocacy groups are a way to get students' voices heard

TYLER GILLESPIE
Columnist

Last week, I received an e-mail from the Office of Students Rights and Responsibilities about the Golden Rule Review Committee.

They're now accepting applications for the 2010-11 school year. I, for one, think that everyone should apply.

With UCF's increasingly rapid expansion, student advocacy groups are becoming extremely important.

These groups help determine the way in which the university addresses procedural issues regarding students.

With UCF's enrollment of more than 53,000, some students may feel that their personal needs in the academic realm are not being properly addressed.

A large public university is kind of like a corporation. And with any large conglomerate, a bureaucratic, red-taped system is usually enacted in order to provide necessary channels of upward communication.

While this type of system may provide officials and directors with an adequate way of dealing with routine problems, it can also make students feel like just another faceless number in the institution.

You know, the left hand doesn't know what the right foot is doing, or something like that.

In such a system, students must have some way of expressing their disputes in order to gain retribution.

Throughout my five years at UCF, I've heard all types of complaints from my friends and expressed some myself about the student's role in the university's proceedings.

Some warranted and others probably not.

I'm sure anyone reading this, who attends a large public institution, could think of some example applicable to their life.

People might say, "You [kids] need to grow up. You can't expect someone to hold your hand through the college process."

But there is a difference between being lazy or ignorant and being overlooked.

Yes, we as students must make ourselves aware of the university's policies.

There are plenty of resources on campus that can help students become more conscious of the university's many idiosyncrasies.

In other words, your biggest advocate is yourself.

But when there is a procedural discrepancy, whether it's in the financial aid department or the advising office, students must have some kind of recourse.

UCF has a lot of great professionals and educators, but one bad experience — be it with an adviser or professor — may ruin the whole college experience.

Student advocacy groups such as the Golden Rule Review Committee can help make sure that students don't get left behind.

Organizing committees for more internal-monitoring groups not only helps the student body, but they also help the university, because more advocacy groups on campus can ensure students' rights aren't systematically being violated.

Potentially, this can make students happier with their overall collegiate experiences.

Expressing student concerns in the institution helps refine the system.

We gotta fight, for our right ... to graduate.

Venues draw acts from everywhere

yet very personal concert for attendees. Despite its size, the venue is renowned nationwide and attracts many big-name acts.

"We regularly see national and internationally touring talent" said Laurin Fedora, the marketing manager of The Social. "Due to the intimate setting and layout of The Social, many bands enjoy playing the club when they might be better suited for a larger venue."

The setting of the club features a stage that is about waist level, so performers regularly jump off, prance around and interact with the crowd.

"Even standing back by the bar, you're still only 20 feet away," Fedora said. "On occasion, a singer will wander through the club and hop up on the bar for a song."

"It's really small, so if you're lucky enough to get a ticket you're really close to the performances," said Kortni Watkins, a senior micro and molecular biology major. "It has a great atmosphere."

The venue plays host to many different acts and genres of music, including reggae, dub, hardcore, punk, rock, singer/songwriter and occasionally country. Every Tuesday night The Social features resident hip-hop, acid jazz house artists Phat-n-Jazzy.

Hip-Hop act 2Live Crew performs at Firestone Live in July of 2007.

COURTESY FIRESTONE LIVE

"The sound is arguably the best of any live music venue downtown," Fedora said.

Over the years, the venue has hosted many bands who now have too many fans for the venue, but these bands still come to Orlando because of their great experiences at The Social.

To allow these bands to play for all their Orlando-based fans, The Social works with other venues in the Orlando area to make sure all fans get to see the act.

"We take these acts to a number of other local venues including the Plaza Theatre, Hard Rock Live and House of Blues," Fedora said.

The Social is then able to bring back bands like The National (whose only Florida appearance is through The Social) and reggae act Slightly Stoopid.

Due to the size of the venue, it is best to buy tickets early, because shows frequently sell out.

If you would like more information on The Social and upcoming concerts visit thesocial.org.

OUR STANCE

Off-color speech should be fine

Note to self: If you ever decide to talk smack about your boss, try not to do it to a Rolling Stone reporter. It could cost you your job.

On second thought, go ahead and do so, especially if he's really asking for it.

On Tuesday, the uproar started after some unsavory comments were made by Gen. Stanley A. McChrystal and his team about President Barack Obama's administration and his decisions over the Afghanistan war to reporter Michael Hastings.

By unsavory, we mean McChrystal was being down-right honest, in his own signature military Patton-esque way.

Most of the comments cited were ones that were made off-handedly, and in personal conversations, while McChrystal was surrounded by a small group of his aides.

If you haven't read the article and are wondering what were some of the comments that is causing all of this ruckus, here are some examples:

"Are you asking about Vice President Biden?"

McChrystal says with a laugh, "Who's that?"

"Biden?" suggests a top adviser. "Did you say: Bite Me?"

Another example was when a McChrystal aide called National Security

Adviser Jim Jones a "clown."

A clown?

Really?

Sure clowns are frightening but, to us, not a good enough reason for McChrystal to lose his job at such a pivotal time in the war. But he lost it anyway, of course, because Obama is one sensitive cat.

And in to replace him comes Gen. David Petraeus ... again, the same general who was in charge of coalition forces in Iraq.

McChrystal's comments may not have been tactful, but at least he didn't lie.

If anything, he helped give the American public some understanding of what he feels is working — and not working — in Afghanistan.

It's strange to us that McChrystal got all this heat for being honest to the American public about his thoughts on the Obama administration.

The man was chosen — by Obama, by the way — for his position because of his knowledge on how to run wars, not his professionalism or charm.

He is an experienced expert on the situation in Afghanistan, so why should he be condemned for giving his opinion?

We mean really, the article mentions how McChrystal's favorite movie is Tal-ladega Nights and his favorite beer is Bud Light Lime.

Clearly, he's not the embodiment of class and sophistication.

Not to mention the article was from Rolling Stone, which is a reputable publication, but much of its political coverage is aimed for shock value.

We guess it worked well this time.

Besides, is now really a time to hand over the responsibility of this war to another general?

We're facing an unrealistic deadline and American soldiers are losing their lives.

Let's put his "poor word choice" aside for a second.

McChrystal spoke to the media about why he thinks the war is not going to be won by allowing the CIA to use drones.

As general, he feels winning the war isn't feasible at this current stage.

The man didn't admit to some gigantic scandal or try to cover anything up.

If this hadn't happened to a president of celebrity status, more people would be on McChrystal's side.

We question why there's so many questions when someone within the administration questions the administration.

Say that 10 times fast, but don't let it get published in Rolling Stone, or else Obama may fire you.

NATE BEELER / THE WASHINGTON EXAMINER

Don't buy the hype: Modesty still valuable

I was shocked when I read the headline "Women find modesty an unattractive trait in men" from an article on the website Asylum.

I am a woman, and I definitely disagree with that headline. In addition, I know several women who would likely dispute this so-called fact too.

We will discuss the reasons it is necessary to appreciate modest men in a moment.

First, I would like to discuss an important aspect, possibly the most important one, of this study: the lack of actual women in it.

Videos of a man and a woman interviewing for a job were shown to 200 people during the study, conducted by researchers from Rutgers University.

Neither the man nor the woman were actual applicants for a job, they were actors reading a script, which called them to be as modest as possible.

The results showed that the female applicants found the male actor to be less qualified for the job because of his humble behavior.

I am not debating that the participants of the study found the male actor to be unattractive.

That is not the point.

What is crucial is that only 200 people were actually used to draw the conclusion that women don't like modest men — and they were not even all women. I have more than 200 female friends on Facebook.

How many females I know — even though it outnumbers the study participants greatly — doesn't give us an accurate idea of how women feel about modest men, either.

Not when there are more than 6 billion people on the planet.

The United States Census Bureau's World Population Clock puts us at about 6.8 billion people.

In my humble opinion, measuring

JERRIANN SULLIVAN
Guest Columnist

the reaction of 200 people is not enough to determine how all or even most women feel about anything.

Since there is not a better study of how women feel about modest men, I thought we could focus on why it is important for ladies to support these fellows. That is if these elusive creatures even exist.

The dictionary defines modest as having or showing a moderate or humble estimate of one's merits or importance.

I have experienced a lot of men talking at me — rather than to or with me — about their brilliance. A less confident, more realistic assessment of their actual achievements would be refreshing.

It is similar to finding $20 in your coat jacket; it is unexpected, and therefore you are pleasantly surprised. I would rather be impressed with someone's actions than being disappointed because they sold me some pipe dream.

Modest doesn't mean meek or mild. The dictionary describes it as being free from vanity, egotism, boastfulness or great pretensions. I am not sure I see what is wrong with anyone being free from vanity.

At the least it will save you some time while waiting to leave the house, because the days of women always taking longer than men to primp are over.

Another common idea of modesty is the absence of showy extravagance, which is the trend right now anyway.

With the recession and high unemployment rate Americans have been less ostentatious.

Whether you nodded or shook your head while reading the Asylum headline it doesn't hurt to appreciate modest behavior.

Just don't be too proud of yourself while doing so.

The Future encourages comments from readers. In order to be considered for publication, letters to the editor should not exceed 300 words; we may edit for length. ## Don't iWaste your old phones

If you were smart and ahead of the game, it's possible you're reading this stance on your brand spankin' new iPhone 4.

Try not to let the drool drip on your new screen, even though we're positive there's an application that can wipe that up for you.

Thursday is a momentous day for all of Steve Jobs' minions, because many people felt that it was time for a new phone.

Not out of necessity, but out of sheer want.

Nobody can resist the temptation of newer, faster technology.

It's completely natural to want the latest gizmo or gadget that Apple or any other company has to offer.

And with the way technology is advancing, we're only going to replace our electronics faster and faster each year.

What's the expression? Gotta keep up with the Jones?

No harm in that.

While you download all your new apps, music and phone numbers, we do have a request.

If you have yet to do anything with your old phone, we ask that you dispose of it responsibly.

Ensure that it is being recycled or, if it is still working, being put to use by someone who is in need of a cell phone but may not have the means to buy a $400 phone that can do everything, anything and then some.

Cell phones are made from materials that can be harmful to the environment when they are not disposed of properly.

According to the Environmental Protection Agency, recycling cell phones saves energy by keeping usable materials out of landfills.

Cell phones are made from materials like metals, copper and plastic.

These materials require energy to mine and manufacture. When cell phones are recycled, they are conserved so that new products may be made.

Recycling your cell phone will also help reduce greenhouse emissions and conserve natural resources.

Just because we are a nation of materialism does not mean that we have to be one of waste.

Recycling or donating your phone is such an easy way to help the environment that we can't help but wonder why someone wouldn't do it. It's almost as bad as people who will throw trash or cigarette buds on the ground when there's a trash can three feet away. The little things make all the difference.

Recycling your cell phone is definitely a less time consuming — and cheaper — way to be green than to change every light bulb in your house or buy all-natural cleaning products.

If you're lucky enough to afford an iPhone, then it's not going to hurt you to make this one simple step for Mother Nature.

We don't want to sound pushy, we just think it's silly to be wasteful.

There are a myriad of websites for which one can use to recycle his or her phone or donate it to a charity that gives cell phones to the needy. The resources are there, all it takes is a little initiative.

Be careful though — some of these websites are scams that just want to sell the guts of your old phone.

Some legit ones are: www.eco-cell.com or www.cellphonesforsoldiers.com.

It's likely that your current or previous cell phone company works in conjunction with a program that will recycle your phone.

All it takes is asking.
